Choosing Photoshop The most obvious feature you need to consider when you're choosing a photo-editing program is that most photo-editing programs have similar features but with some variation in the user interface. Photoshop is the program that is used by many photographers and therefore is the de facto choice for digital image manipulation. However, there are many alternatives. Adobe Photoshop Elements is a very popular program for those who don't need the high-powered tools available in Photoshop but do need a bit of image manipulation. In fact, it was originally created as a new version of Photoshop but was re-branded as a standalone program. Adobe Photoshop Elements has its own layer editing and image retouching features that are superior to anything Adobe Photoshop could offer. It is, however, a paid

Q: How can I make it better to use a new computer? I'm using MS Windows 8.1 and I use mostly Windows Explorer for file operations. In fact, I seldom use any other program. In the past, I installed Linux based OS, and I liked it better. So I'm thinking to install Linux for the next time. I'm surprised that it takes too much time to format and install new OS. This time I decide to try when I have a break time. I intend to use NTFS for the operating system and store all my data in the home directory. Is it normal? Will it be faster to use another file system and operating system, or it's just the normal stuff?

A: NTFS will be a good choice: it is a very popular file system and almost all available software supports it (including the ones for file compression and encryption).

A: Any newer Linux distros would be a good choice. Just keep in mind that the Linux desktop is a bit complicated and it takes some time to adjust to that environment (especially for novices).

A: Linux is a good choice, since most software is cross-platform, and will run on many flavors of Linux. However, NTFS is well tested and cross-platform.

Correlation of mechanical properties of CCHMC and poly(methyl methacrylate) bone cements under linear and compressive dynamic loads. The cement mantle is widely used in orthopedics, but it is affected by the mechanical properties of the bone cement used to bind it to the bone. Poly(methyl methacrylate) (PMMA) bone cement has been widely used for decades, but recently the attention has been focused on calcium chelating hydrated cements (CCHMC) as an alternative to PMMA because of its biocompatibility and biostability. The aim of the present work is to assess the mechanical properties of two commercial CCHMCs and PMMA bone cements, processed by the same manufacturer. The difference between the mechanical properties of the two CCHMCs under compressive loads are also discussed. Three different bone cements with a similar composition were produced from two bioactive glass cements (BGCC and CCHMC B) and one poly(methyl methacrylate) bone cement (PMMA). The mechanical tests were carried out using an Instron machine, being a compression test (linear) and compressive cyclic test (linear and cyclic). No significant difference was found among the mechanical properties obtained in the compression test. On the contrary, under dynamic loads, BGCC and CCHMC bone cements showed a statistically significant difference of compressive strength and energy absorption and loss coefficients. PMMA bone cement showed no difference in compressive strength under dynamic loads. The particularities of the tested materials in terms of the mechanical properties make the choice of the correct bone cement very important when performing an orthopedic operation. Only a combination of mechanical and biological properties will contribute to an adequate in vivo function of the implant. Surveying refugees and non-refugees with the National Center for PTSD. The Trauma Symptom Checklist for DSM-5 (TSC-5) for refugees and non-refugees is presented. A total of 74 non-refugees, 109 asylum-seekers, and 52 refugees who had undergone the screening were selected from a larger sample. Results from the TSC-5 indicated that refugees showed greater PTSD symptom severity, and higher than non-refugees on 9 out of the 25 TSC-5 items. Refugees reported slightly lower self-reported quality of life than non-refugees. The findings demonstrate that refugees and non-refugees differ in their trauma-related symptom
